Electric Blueprint

Megadeth's Marty Friedman and Dave Mustaine

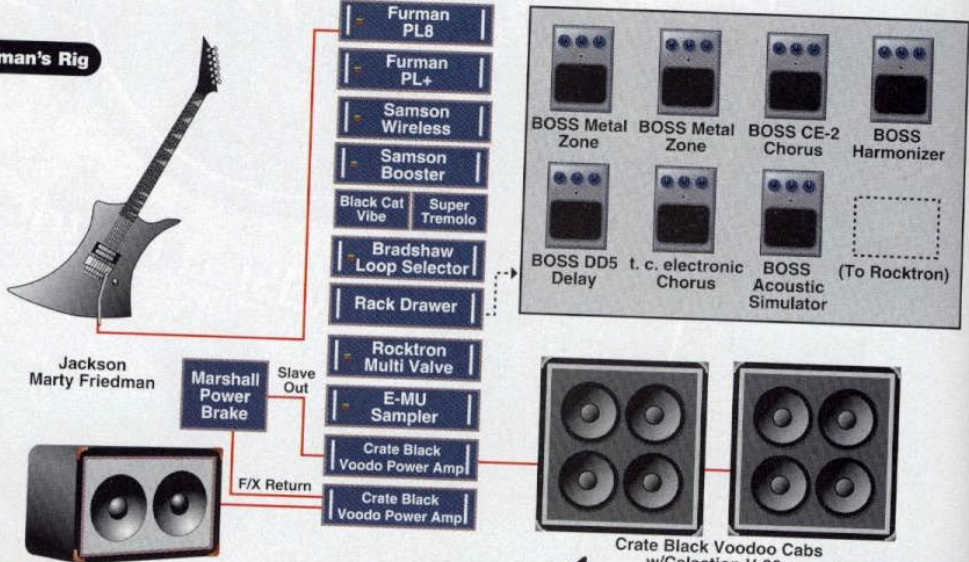

by Jon Chappell

Megadeth lead guitarist Marty Friedman uses a Jackson Marty Friedman signature model, outfitted with one bridge-position Duncan JB and one volume control (no tone). He first goes into a Samson wireless unit, then into a Bradshaw-manufactured Black Cat Vibe and Super Tremolo. From there, it's into a four-point loop selector (also by Bradshaw), which is operated by Marty's tech, Jimmy Amason. "They like a real clean stage setup," says Amason about Marty and Dave Mustaine. "They use in-ear monitors, and Marty doesn't touch anything except his guitar, so there's very little onstage. The techs do all the switching—even tweaking the controls on the pedals." So that Amason can truly appreciate all the sonic power of what's happening onstage, he taps a line out from Marty's Crate Black Voodoo head and runs it through a Marshall Power Brake to his own head and cab, via the effects return jack. "That way, I know when the tone or effects need adjusting," he explains.

Frontman and guitarist Dave Mustaine also strives for an austere stage setup, getting most of his sound through a Rocktron Prophecy. It acts as both a preamp and effects processor, so the line outs (the unit is stereo) go directly to the left and right inputs of a Marshall Dual EL34 power amp, which drives two Marshall cabs outfitted with Celestion Vintage-30 speakers. He also goes wireless with his custom Jackson, code-named "Y2K-V" until a final name is selected. Dave's tech, Ernie Hudson, also works all of Dave's effects, changing the Prophecy presets via a Rocktron All Access pedalboard. "We keep it straightforward," he says, "and we have an exact duplicate setup of the entire rig, so that if something goes wrong we just switch the outputs of the wireless into the new rack and we're back up. We don't even think about fixing anything during the show. That's for tomorrow."
